Today – Clouds will gradually increase through the day as clusters of storms over Iowa push eastward. This activity will track into Illinois, with only a few showers possible west of Madison this afternoon. We may see a few sprinkles over the area after 4 PM, but for the most part we will remain dry. Temperatures will warm to the lower or middle 70s early, and then fall to the middle 60s by 6 PM.

Extended forecast – A warm front will lift through northern Illinois tonight and stall just south of Madison Saturday. There will be a small threat for a few showers or storms tomorrow morning and then again tomorrow evening. The frontal boundary will finally lift north of the area Saturday night, ushering more humid air northward and raising the risk for showers and storms through Sunday.
