Today – Rain and embedded thunderstorms are expected to continue through 7 or 8am, with activity becoming more intermittent for a large majority of the day as additional waves of showers and storms develop as instability builds through the day. Thunderstorms will become widespread once again late this afternoon and will continue overnight. Additional rainfall through 6pm: 0.75-1.50", locally higher possible in heavy bands of showers or thunderstorms. Sunrise: 6:57am / Sunset: 6:08pm

Extended forecast – A front draped across the Yucatán Peninsula will remain stalled to our west through Friday. Out ahead of this boundary periods of rain and thunderstorms to remain likely. Rain will be heavy at times due to very high moisture values in place. Though rain and storms will be possible at any time ahead of this boundary, expect precipitation/storm chances to peak during the overnight hours and again during the late afternoon/evening hours. The cold front will finally push southeast of the area Saturday morning, ushering in considerably drier air for the weekend. A few light showers will remain possible Saturday morning, with dry conditions anticipated for Saturday afternoon and throughout the day on Sunday.

Forecast prepared by meteorologist Joe Halvorson.
