Today – A scattered band of showers north of the area may arrive in the next 45-60 minutes. This band has begun to show signs of weakening/dissipation – but cannot rule out the potential for a brief heavy downpour or a slim (10%) threat for a stray lightning strike. Thereafter, any lingering showers will likely come to an end by 8:30-9am. Mostly cloudy skies will become mostly sunny by midday. Winds will be light throughout the day, becoming east-northeasterly by mid-morning. The temperature will reach a high near 84°F.

Extended forecast – Dry conditions are expected overnight under partly cloudy skies. The overnight low will be in the lower 60s. Weak upper-level disturbances may set off overnight/early morning complexes of showers and thunderstorms across western/central Nebraska this weekend, but precipitation probabilities remain low each day as the majority of forecast model guidance suggests this activity will not maintain itself and push into eastern Nebraska. Southeasterly winds will become breezy on Sunday, with gusts to 20 mph in the afternoon.
