7 AM Weather Forecast

Friday, April 9, 2021

Synopsis: Skies are mostly cloudy this morning with mild temperatures in the 60's and light southerly winds. As a warm front lifts towards the Augusta area from the southwest through the day, this will bring increasing chances for scattered showers and thunderstorms during the afternoon hours, mainly after 4 PM. This activity will be hit-or-miss but will have potential to produce lightning and a downpour if moving directly over the course, so this will be monitored closely. Otherwise, expect temperatures to reach the lower 80's again today with southerly winds up to 10-15 mph, slightly lower than yesterday. The front lifts to the north tonight into Saturday morning and this scenario should keep most of any showers to the north. A weakening line of rain and thunderstorms approaches from the west during the day on Saturday and is expected to move through Augusta between 2-6 PM before shifting east for the evening. The actual cold front will not move through the region until Sunday, and this will keep the chance of a few showers in the forecast through the early afternoon before the sunshine and pleasant conditions return.
