Extended Forecast – Increasing clouds are expected overnight tonight into tomorrow morning ahead of an approaching area of low pressure coming in from the southeast. This low pressure system will give way to a chance of PM thunderstorms tomorrow. A series of cold fronts are expected on Sunday with the first passage during the morning hours. This will result in high temperatures only peaking around 70F during the afternoon. Storm chances are low due to a relatively stable atmosphere as the secondary front passes during the afternoon/evening hours. Periods of showers can still be expected across the area on Sunday. Total rainfall amounts are expected to remain under half an inch over the weekend.
