Today – The marine layer has pushed into portions of the Monterey Peninsula this morning with areas of low clouds and fog. The fog should lift later this morning, but areas of low clouds will remain present and linger along the coastline. Expect a mix of clouds and sun today with clouds thinning out by later in the afternoon. Today’s high temperature is forecast in the upper 60s with light northwest winds.

Extended forecast – The week ahead looks to be cool with high temperatures in the 60s each day. Measurable rainfall is not forecast this week, but the chance will exist for some brief periods of mist or drizzle during the morning hours should the marine layer push inland. Most days can expect a mix of clouds and sun with the possibility of morning fog. Breeziest winds will occur Wednesday and Thursday with lighter winds during tournament rounds.
