Today – Ample sunshine expected today as dry and warm conditions persist across the region. Some of the SW'ly flow aloft will increase today as the system across the Pacific NW begins to deepen. This will result in SW'ly winds to increase this afternoon with a few gusts nearing/reaching 20mph at times beyond 2PM. PM highs will reach into the low-90s.

Extended forecast – The mid-level feature continues to spin off the Pacific NW coast while further deepening. This increase in intensity will continue into tomorrow providing a slight uptick in the winds through the PM hours on Friday. A few gusts tomorrow could reach near 22-24mph. As the feature finally works towards Boise late Friday into Saturday, an increasing chance for scattered showers is forecast. Much of the precipitation is expected through Saturday as on/off showers and a low threat for a pop-up t-storm or two develops across the region. Conditions will begin to clear late Saturday into Sunday morning with NW'ly winds relaxing late in the weekend.

Forecast prepared by meteorologist Tim Calamari.
