Today – Scattered bands of moderate to heavy rain and isolated thunderstorms have developed out ahead of a cold front this morning. Anticipate that periods of rain will become increasing likely this afternoon as the boundary reaches Bermuda, with instances of heavy rain and sporadic thunderstorm activity expected. Rain will persist this evening and overnight but should gradually diminish to isolated showers around daybreak Wednesday.

Extended forecast – Periods of rain overnight will become isolated showers by 8am Wednesday under a mix of sun and clouds. A few showers Thursday with west-southwesterly winds at 12-20 mph along with gusts of 20-25 mph. Friday will see isolated showers in the morning gradually increase to a scattered coverage in the afternoon as a cold front sinks down from the northwest. Forecast confidence remains medium-low for the weekend. Currently anticipate periods of rain overnight Friday into Saturday morning with activity diminishing in coverage Saturday afternoon as the boundary pushes south of Bermuda. This boundary may then lift back to the north on Sunday, with scattered morning showers transitioning to widespread areas of rain Sunday afternoon and evening. Blustery northeasterly to east-northeasterly winds are anticipated on Saturday and Sunday.
